Federal Housing Administration (FHA) Loans

The FHA program is a great option for anyone looking to buy a starter home, mostly because potential buyers only need to put down 3.5% of a home's value at the time of purchase. Contrast that to the 20% most conventional loans require and you'll understand the benefit. In fact, it's one of the easiest mortgages to qualify for. However, to receive the program's biggest perk, you must have a FICO® credit score of 580 or higher. If yours falls between 500 and 580, you'll need to make a 10% down payment. That's still only half of a typical mortgage down payment. Though backed by the U.S. federal government, applicants secure FHA loans with outside lenders.

Veterans Administration (VA) Loans

The Department of Veterans Affairs insures VA loans from third-party mortgage lenders. The program began after many military members were unable to secure enough income or savings to apply for a mortgage once they completed their service. As such, VA loans do not require any down payment.

The Good Neighbor Next Door Program

From the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development (HUD) this program is only available to emergency personnel and teachers. Although not technically a loan, it allows these individuals to receive a 50% discount on the purchase price of a new home. To pay for the home, you could get a conventional, VA or FHA mortgage or pay cash.
